

Abstract

A group of new synthetic antimicrobial peptides are disclosed, which demonstrate stronger bactericidal activity than native antimicrobial peptides. The present synthetic antimicrobial peptides can be produced by solid-phase chemical synthesis or gene expression and be used to prepare the medicines for treating the diseases induced by bacteria, viruses and fungi, as well as the anticancer drugs.